Background

- Regions of focal contact and close contact between the cell surface and the extracellular substratum are the sites primarily responsible for cell adhesion. Thus, focal contacts provide anchorage sites essential for the maintenance of tension within the cell.
- In addition, focal contacts are involved in regulation of cell morphology, proliferation, migration, differentiation, and responsiveness.